This is an exciting time for us in the archdiocese. We are in the midst of celebrating our 175th anniversary! We have so much to be thankful for over these past years, and certainly one of our greatest blessings has been our Catholic schools. Perhaps the best way to appreciate the power of these schools is to imagine the Church in central and southern Indiana without them.

What would our archdiocese look like without Catholic schools? Would it be as robust and vital? How would it generate generous leaders? How would it serve immigrants? How would it provide avenues of educational opportunity to the poor, especially in our cities? Who would Christ use to build up his kingdom?

As we recognize the importance of Catholic education in our society, we also celebrate one of its foundations as we mark Catholic Schools Week. Service is a long-standing tradition in Catholic education, and a principle of the Church’s social teaching. Thus, this year’s theme for Catholic Schools Week, “Catholic Schools Celebrate Service,” is particularly fitting.

Why? Because when we commit to educating the whole child in an environment of faith and academic excellence then our schools instill a lifelong commitment to serving others. It is our hope that, in providing a strong Catholic culture for our students, they will grow up to become good citizens, productive employees and exemplary leaders. As you read this Catholic Schools Week Supplement, you will find many examples of how our children turn that hope into a generous reality.

Our students collect food for the poor, host blood drives, build homes in other countries as well as here in the United States, and send relief to war-torn countries and to those affected by natural disasters. The list goes on as does their commitment.

Jesus asks us to serve others. Our schools still focus on the corporal and spiritual works of mercy—feed the hungry, clothe the naked, instruct the ignorant, forgive all injuries—to name a few. In living out these works of mercy, the student is called to give witness to the love of God among us.

Our schools have developed a proud heritage of service for our Church and the community it serves. Clearly, our Catholic schools have made a tremendous difference.

There are many great biblical scholars and important leaders who express the words of what it really means to serve. Two especially make my point about Catholic education and its focus on service. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said that “everyone can be great because everyone can serve.” We feel there are no exceptions to this statement. All students can serve God and, by doing so, serve others. And Aristotle reminds us that “the greatest virtues are those which are most useful to other persons.”

What a powerful statement! It says to us that we must all be messengers of social justice. What is positive in the world must be shared with others. Injustices, on the other hand, must be overcome.

Catholic schools provide this daily experience. They demonstrate over and over again the Gospel message of love and forgiveness.

Our Catholic schools are gifts to the communities they serve. When the story of Catholic schools is written, historians will look back on our age, our archdiocese and marvel that against great odds, we not only persevered but strengthened our schools. We truly did celebrate our heritage of 175 years, and made a difference while serving others.

Let us remember the work of Blessed Teresa of Calcutta by doing simple things for others and by doing them with extraordinary love.

Let us together celebrate and pray for all Catholic schools and students that God’s rich blessings will be with them as once again they make their mark when called to “Celebrate Service” in 2009. Let us together feel a sense of pride for the accomplishments of our Catholic schools for these past 175 years and for decades to come.

Snapshots of service

Students’ community efforts touch lives, including their own

By Joanne Schaufussey

Call them “snapshots of service”—pictures of the remarkable variety of ways that Catholic school students across the archdiocese make a difference in their communities and the world.

Take a look at this photo of some of the 240 students from Bishop Chatard High School in Indianapolis dancing for seven straight hours while raising more than $36,400 for Riley Hospital for Children in Indianapolis.

And check this snapshot of Zach Helinger—a freshman at Our Lady of Providence Jr./Sr. High School in Clarksville—whose volunteer efforts help to make life easier for people with disabilities.

You also have to see this photo of Terry Majors interacting with Indiana lawmakers. The sophomore at Providence Cristo Rey High School in Indianapolis is a member of the Indiana Legislative Youth Advisory Council.

And here’s a picture of the students at Roncalli High School in Indianapolis, which was one of six Indiana high schools honored in 2008 for their commitment to community service.

The award from Indiana State University in Terre Haute commended Roncalli for efforts that included collecting 100,000 cans of food, raising $9,000 for homeless people and donating 2,500 toys for children in need.

Service is a way of life—and an expression of faith—for Catholic school students. Just look at these snapshots...

Unleashing possibilities

Nicole Zopp admits she never felt a real commitment to community service until she drove by the Madison-jefferson County Animal Shelter with her friend, Katherine Bear, and thought it would be a great place to volunteer.

“Katherine and I stopped in there at the beginning of the summer,” recalls Nicole, who, like Katherine, is a junior at Father Michael Shavey Memorial Jr./Sr. High School in Madison. “We started off walking dogs and playing with them, and it was so rewarding. They’re cooped up there every day, and they don’t get out a lot. They were so full of energy.”

Nicole became especially fond of a dog named Chloe, a mix of a Collie and a Labrador retriever.

“I was walking her one day and when I brought her back, a family started looking at her and adopted her. It was so great that she got adopted by a really nice family. Working at the animal shelter made her feel so special, and I was so excited to see all the people we were able to help.”

Providing a comfort zone

Before her idea grew into a grand plan that even the Indianapolis Colts embraced, Claire Helman was just looking for a good way to help small children when they are scared.

“My mom works in the fight against domestic violence,” says Claire, a seventh-grade student at St. Thomas Aquinas School in Indianapolis. “We were talking after dinner one night about how we could help kids in traumatic situations. And we came up with blankets. Blankets are a great way to give comfort.”

That conversation has led to “Claire’s Comfort for Kids,” a community service project to put blankets in the hands of Streets—Stop the Violence.”

So on Nov. 1, 2008, the school once again reached out to its neighboring community with a fall festival of service—an outreach effort that was so successful that school officials have decided to make it a continuing commitment.

“We want to get our students out in the community cleaning vacant lots, painting houses, cutting grass for shut-ins and doing errands for them,” says Paul Lockard, the school’s president. “We want our parents to get involved, too.”

“We’ve always wanted to be a center of peace and justice through understanding. Being one of the most diverse schools in the area, we can send our kids out and actually be an advocate for diversity. We want to demonstrate that even though there are differences in race and creed, we are all inherently good.”

Placing the seed

As the principal of St. Simon the Apostle School in Indianapolis, Kathy Wright often marvels at the way that simple school lessons can lead to special efforts that change lives.

“Our second-grade classes sold apples to the student body after they did an economics lesson on the apples,” Wright notes. “They secured a $200 loan from Regions Bank, went to the orchard, picked the apples, and sold them for 25 cents to the students during the lunch times. They collected more than $300 after paying their loan back. They decided they wanted to help 27 families [in need] with multiple children.

“In order to have more money, they had a penny [fundraiser] for one week before our Thanksgiving break. They collected more than $1,100, which gave them $1,400 to shop at Wal-Mart for gifts. They were each given $20 and a list of what the child wanted. Then they came back to school and wrapped all the gifts. I think this was an experience that will live with these children for many years.”

Making the extra effort

Eric Nixon keeps a busy schedule as a senior at Father Thomas Scevica Memorial High School in Indianapolis. The 17-year-old youth takes several advanced placement classes, serves as the Student Council treasurer and a school ambassador, and works 20 to 30 hours a week at a grocery store. Still, he made time to lead the canned food drive in November at his school for a simple reason.

“There are so many people in need, it’s incredible,” he says. “The more you can do and give, the better it will be.”

Eric approached the manager at the grocery store where he works about purchasing canned foods at cost. Then he enlisted the help of his fellow students in raising money to pay for the canned foods.

“We improved double-fold our total from last year,” Eric says. “This year, we collected 15,607 cans. I was really excited to see all the people we were able to help.”

Dancing for seven straight hours, 240 students from Bishop Chatard High School in Indianapolis participated in a dance marathon in October of 2008. The school’s annual fundraiser earned more than $36,400 to benefit Riley Hospital for Children in Indianapolis.

Five Louies share an amazing story of faith and family

By John Shaughnessy

When you hear the story of the five people named Louie Annee, you realize it's a story about commitment—to a dream, a family and a way of life.

You also realize that the story of the five Louies might make a good commercial for the continuing value of a Catholic education.

Start with the story of the oldest Louie Annee, whose parents immigrated to the United States and Indianapolis in the early 1900s.

Coming from an area along the border of France and Germany, his parents wanted a new life for themselves and a Catholic education for Louie and his brother. So Louie attended the former Sacred Heart School and Cathedral High School, both in Indianapolis, before he had to leave school to help support his family.

Catholic education was also the choice that the oldest Louie Annee, now 98, and his wife, Mildred, made for their seven children, including their oldest child who they also named Louie.

“We all went to Catholic grade schools and Catholic high schools,” says the second-generation Louie, 70, who graduated from the former Sacred Heart School in Indianapolis. “It was very important to my parents to send us to Catholic schools. And I always felt it was important for my children, too. We had eight kids. We thought that if they were raised right, they would raise their family in the right way. A Catholic education helps people do that. We had seen the example of what it had done for our family.”

Sacrifices had to be made to make it possible, he says.

“When we found out we were having a child, we had no idea what we were going to do in the first year of life. We came from the southside of Indianapolis, and it was very hard to find a house. But we decided to have a house and a family. And we wanted to give our children a Catholic education.”

So the Annees, who also named Louie, their eldest child, had the third-generation Louie, who is 48, a 1979 graduate of Roncalli High School in Indianapolis and the owner of The Abrium and The Columns, two bankrupt facilities. “Catholic education definitely had a big impact on me. The respect and the discipline are so much different than public schools. The kids’ attitudes are so much different.”

There is also no doubt that this Louie and his wife, Elizabeth, both Roncalli graduates, want to provide a Catholic education for their son, Louie.

“My parents sacrificed a lot to make sure we had that,” says Louie, the fourth generation. “It will be important for me for Louie to go to Catholic school. You look around and you want to make sure they’re raised right. To me, a Catholic education is much more than the education they get. It’s also the other parents and children in Catholic schools. It’s their involvement in their children’s lives. I want my child around other children who have that background in their lives.”

That dedication to Catholic education has been a foundation for nearly a century for the Annee family—and for countless other families in the 173-year-history of the archdiocese.

“A ll five generations and before have always been Catholic,” says Louie Annee, the third generation. “To me, there’s no other way to believe. It’s the backbone of our family. In good times and bad times, we lean on our religion. It’s the foundation of our family and everything. If my opinion counts, there’s no doubt I want my grandchildren to have a Catholic education.”

What matters to you?

Ask anyone who’s ever been: going to college matters. It’s a choice that helps define who you are, and who you will become. Your experiences at college—in and out of the classroom—will shape your ideas and opinions for years—probably forever.

At Marian College, you will be personally challenged to incorporate awareness of the world and a sense of responsibility—lessons of concern and respect that can be learned and practiced over a lifetime. These lessons are based on our Catholic faith and Franciscan values—dignity of the individual, peace and justice, reconciliation, and responsible stewardship.

‘A powerful difference’
Lay educators share what makes Catholic education special

By John Shaughnessy

Consider the transformation that marked Sandi Patel's life—from days as a girl growing up in the Catholic faith to her first years as a teacher in a Catholic school.

“When I was a little girl, I would dutifully file into the front pew on the right side of the church with my family,” Patel recalls. “In my teenage years, I challenged my parents about the importance of going to church. My mom would simply reply, ‘Some day, you will be grateful for your Catholic faith.’

“That ‘some day’ came 17 years ago when, as a newlywed, I moved to Indianapolis. I started teaching music at St. Philip Neri, and I saw the power of a Catholic education. My passion was ignited growing up in the Catholic faith to her first experiences teaching in a public school. I never looked back.

With all my heart, I believe that the children in our classrooms will make a powerful difference in the world. They will see the world through their hearts filled with Christ, and they will be motivated to become his hands and feet. It is my privilege to be part of that wonderful reality—a wonderful reality with a foundation set in a Catholic school.

Now the principal of Sts. Francis and Clare School in Greenwood, Patel is one of the more than 1,900 staff members who serve and teach some 23,000 students in the Archdiocese of Indianapolis. The Criterion asked some of those educators to share their thoughts on the importance of a Catholic education, and their commitment to providing it.

Colleen Burdette, sixth-grade teacher at Pope John XXIII School in Madison

“I have a former student who is now in the Navy. His captain called him into the office one day and asked if he went to a Catholic school. When he responded with a yes, the captain told him he could tell because he was always prepared, on time and ready to work.

“A good friend of mine was teaching at the college level in Ohio. She did not attend a Catholic high school, but she could pick those in her classes who had. She could pick those students for the same reasons the Navy captain did.

“The atmosphere in a Catholic school is different in my experience. Although I have spent so much time in the Catholic system, I have also spent plenty of time in the public system. When God can enter a classroom, there is an entirely different feel. So often, my telling the students what is right or wrong isn’t enough, but when I can show the students how God wants them to live, the point is much more easily made. It is especially effective when students receive similar messages at home.”

Kymberli Payenok, pre-school teacher at St. Patrick School in Terre Haute

“I teach 3-, 4- and 5-year-olds, and it is a treat to introduce them to our faith. They are so open and loving and in awe when we learn about Jesus or stories from the Bible. We just ended the Christmas season. We learn the story of Jesus’ humble birth, and I’m so proud of my students when they talk about Bethlehem instead of the North Pole. None of this takes away from their love of Santa, of course, but it certainly helps them focus on the true story of Christmas.

“I have been a faithful Catholic all of my life, but I attended public school up through eighth grade. When I moved on to a Catholic high school and later a Catholic college, I couldn’t help but notice that the kids who came from the Catholic grade school had a foundation in faith that I didn’t have. I had always attended CCD, but I couldn’t learn in one hour a week what the Catholic school kids received daily at school.”

Michael Joseph, former teacher and now campus director at Holy Angels School in Indianapolis

“I sense that parents who choose Catholic education desire something greater for their children. Education is not just about learning to read and write, but also about learning everything there is to know about life—morality, a sense of self-worth, a sense of pride in who you are, and a sense of belonging to a group. I think that parents choose Catholic education for those reasons in addition to a great and high-level academic experience.

“Faith is shared and practiced even if one is not of the Catholic faith. A academics are designed to obtain success. And extremely high expectations are demanded of students and parents. Parents recognize that it is a powerful difference.”

Teacher travels to France to seek essence of St. Theodora

By John Shaughnessy

Even while everything possible seemed to go wrong, Madonna Paskash still believed she would eventually make it to the home of the woman who inspired her life.

Never mind that the Catholic school teacher from Bloomington hadn't even traveled outside the United States.

Never mind that she had just arrived in France, a country where she didn't know the language.

Never mind that she kept getting lost as she drove to the small French town that was her destination—a journey that was supposed to take six hours and ended up taking 12—all day long.

Whatever she became frustrated during the trip, Paskash thought of the hardships that were faced by the woman who inspired her and this once-in-a-lifetime adventure—St. Theodora Guérin, the Sister of Providence who endured a three-month journey from France in 1846 and arrived in the Indiana wilderness with a dream of providing a Catholic education for children of all backgrounds.

"When she came to Indiana, she got plunked in the mud in the middle of the forest," says Paskash, an assistant principal and a third-grade teacher at St. Charles Borromeo School in Bloomington. "Yet she was so loving of everyone she met, and she had such a great faith in Providence. Making the trip to France was a real challenge for me. I thought it would give me a small sense of what she encountered because I didn't know the language or the culture. It made me a stronger person."

Paskash made the trip to France in the summer of 2008, thanks to an $8,000 Teacher Creativity Fellowship that she received from Lilly Endowment Inc. in Indianapolis. In applying for the grant, Paskash wanted to learn about the life of St. Theodora so she could give school performances as the Hoosier educational pioneer.

"I've always had a really close connection to the Sisters of Providence in a lot of ways," Paskash says. "I graduated in 1974 from Ladywood-St. Agnes Academy in Indianapolis. The Sisters of Providence owned and ran that school. I felt they made a real difference in my life. They taught me how to think, not what to think. They taught me leadership and to have the courage of my convictions. I like to believe we pass those things along to our children at St. Charles."

"Since religious sisters haven't taught at St. Charles for a long time, Paskash wanted to give the school's students a sense of the historical significance of the Sisters of Providence, especially St. Theodora."

"I wrote my fellowship so I would spend six weeks of the summer studying her life," she says. "I read several books about her. I visited and worked with sisters at Saint Mary-of-the-Woods College. I did storytelling workshops to get my skills better. I practiced and learned some basic French and worked on a French accent so I would sound like her.a"

The Sisters of Providence were so thrilled by her interest that one of them, Sister Mary Loyola Bender, volunteered to create and sew a reproduction of a religious habit from 1840 for Paskash.

"She was so at the time," Paskash says about Sister Mary. "She's just a doll.

The journey to France with her husband and their two children was the key part of her education about St. Theodora.

"I wanted to visit her birthplace, Etables, France," Paskash says. "They still have the home where she was born. It's been renovated so you can visit it. You can't really take a bus or a train to Etables. I had to rent a vehicle in Paris. That was very challenging for me. I knew a few basic French phrases, but not many people there speak English and there weren't many signs. I got lost a lot."

"Surviving those struggles added to her appreciation of finally visiting the home where St. Theodora spent her early years."

"I was amazed it was still there," she recalls. "It gave me a real sense of what she was like as a person, what her life was like. They showed me where her garden was. They took me to the beautiful church where she would have gone to Mass. It was fun."

The fun continued when she gave her first performance as St. Theodora at St. Charles Borromeo School on Oct. 2, the birthday of the saint.

"I dressed up in her habit and told her story to the children with her accent," she says. "I felt it was an important thing to do for the children. Instead of reading them a book or telling them about her life, I wanted to give them a chance to see her. The children were very sweet. The little ones were in awe of me. The older ones had a lot of questions."

The extra effort reflects the approach that Paskash has given during her 30 years as a teacher. Her time spent learning more about St. Theodora reflects the inspiration that the saint has had on her life.

"It has reinforced my faith," Paskash says. "I try to stress to my students that faith isn't waiting for God to make miracles in your life. It's doing everything you possibly can and then giving it over to God to make things happen."

"St. Mother Theodora is such a great example of that. She was tireless in her efforts and never gave up. She believed in her heart that God would care for them. That fits my life as well. I try to live that every day. You need to pray every day. But also I try to do everything I can to live my faith every day. **"
A tradition of excellence

Bishops embrace education and faith formation

By Mary Ann Wyand

Two commitments have always guided Catholic education in the archdiocese—creating a foundation of faith and shaping a vision of the future for children. Today, that twin focus has led to a 97 percent high school graduation rate in the archdiocese, with 94 percent of those graduates entering college.

The approach has also earned national Blue Ribbon School of Excellence recognition from the U.S. Department of Education for 25 Catholic schools in the archdiocese—more than any other diocese in the country.

That dual commitment has been shared by Catholic families, lay teachers, priests, and religious sisters and brothers. It also has been a priority for the 11 bishops and archbishops who have served Catholics in central and southern Indiana since May 6, 1834, in the Diocese of Vincennes and then in the Diocese of Indianapolis when it was established on Nov. 28, 1843.

Here’s a historic look at how each of those 11 spiritual leaders have shaped Catholic education in the archdiocese in the past 175 years.

Servant of God Bishop Simon Brude

A physician, priest and former Catholic college president, Bishop Brude graduated from medical school at the University of Catholic education in the archdiocese in Indianapolis when it was established on May 6, 1834, in the Diocese of Vincennes and then in the Diocese of Indianapolis when it was established on Nov. 28, 1843.

He is remembered for his devotion to the priesthood as a member of the Society of St. Sulpice and come to America as a missionary.

Upon his arrival in southern Indiana in late 1834, the first Bishop of Vincennes dedicated his ministry to educating people in the faith and preparing men for the priesthood.

He invited the Sisters of Charity from Kentucky to help him with the ministry of Catholic education in the new diocese, and archival records report that “before very long about 50 day pupils and four boarders were in attendance” at the school in Vincennes.

In a comparatively short period of time, an educational system had been set up in Vincennes; the archival records explain, “which included complete elementary, secondary and higher education for both sexes and which was intended as a model for the entire diocese.”

Bishop Brude worked hard to recruit 20 priests and seminarians as well as establish churches and schools in the German Catholic settlements in southern Indiana.

Within five years, 130 students attended elementary schools, and both a college for men and an academy for women had been established in the diocese.

“In addition to that of being head of the diocese,” the archival records note, “the first bishop’s duties embraced those of pastor of the congregation, seminary professor and school teacher.”

Bishop Brude was recognized as “one of the most learned and distinguished men as well as an outstanding Catholic educator in the United States.”

He died on June 26, 1839, in Vincennes.

Bishop Czechin de la Hailandiére

A lawyer and priest, Bishop de la Hailandiére was installed as bishop of Vincennes in Paris on Aug. 18, 1839.

Before returning to Indiana, he appealed to the French Sisters of Providence for help in educating Catholics in his diocese.

Responding to his invitation, Mother Theodore Guérin—now St. Theodora Guérin—came to the diocese with five sisters to found what would become Saint Mary-of-the-Woods College, recruits new sisters and later teach at parish schools.

During his eight years as bishop, he carried on Bishop Brude’s plans for educational system in the diocese. He also arranged for the construction of a library to preserve his predecessor’s large collection of scholarly books.

He died on May 1, 1882, in France.

Bishop John Stephen Bazin

A priest and former college president, Bishop Bazin was interested in the religious instruction of children.

He was installed as bishop on Oct. 24, 1847, but died in Vincennes a few months later on April 23, 1848.

Bishop Jacques de St. Palais

A former nobleman, Bishop St. Palais was installed on Jan. 14, 1849, in Vincennes.

He is remembered for his commitment to caring for orphans and the education of young men for the priesthood.

Also in 1849, he approved the establishment of an academy and free school by the Sisters of Providence at Saint Mary-of-the-Woods.

During his eight years as bishop, he “saw the incorporation of the academy,” which included complete elementary, secondary and higher education for both sexes and which was intended as a model for the entire diocese.”

Bishop Hugh M. St. George

A priest and former college president, Bishop St. George was installed as bishop of Vincennes on March 21, 1857.

He invited the Sisters of Providence at Saint Mary-of-the-Woods for participating with [grade school] pupils in religious services on the playground of St. Peter and Paul School.

Archbishop Joseph E. Ritter

A native of New Albany, Auxiliary Bishop Joseph E. Ritter was named bishop on March 24, 1934, and was installed as the first archbishop of Indianapolis on Dec. 19, 1944. After Pope Pius XII signed the apostolic decree establishing the Archdiocese of Indianapolis, Ritter was remembered for his courageous commitment to civil rights and for integrating the Catholic schools during the archdiocese’s two decades before the U.S. Supreme Court struck down racial segregation in public schools.

In 1946, he was appointed to lead the Archdiocese of St. Louis, where he also supervised the integration of Catholic schools.

Achbishop Ritter was named a cardinal by Pope John XXIII on Jan. 16, 1961. He died on June 10, 1967, in St. Louis.

Archbishop Paul C. Schulte

A native of Marion County, Auxiliary Bishop Paul C. Schulte was named bishop on March 24, 1944, and was installed as the first archbishop of Indianapolis on Dec. 19, 1944. After Pope Pius XII signed the apostolic decree establishing the Archdiocese of Indianapolis, Schulte was remembered for his educational progress in the Diocese of Indianapolis during his administration that the Archdiocese of Indianapolis became known nationally for its total Catholic education and the establishment of lay boards of education to govern the parish elementary schools and interparochial high schools.

A revel journal report that “it was during his administration that the archdiocese became known nationally for its holistic approach to Catholic education under the leadership of Father Gerald A. Gettefgter, then superintendent of Catholic education” and was now a bishop of the Diocese of Evansville.

Achbishop Buechlein also initiated the arts in parish school programs, the first new inner-city Catholic schools in central and southern Indiana during his years as archbishop.

I participated in different kinds of internships for experience, and not for the money. If it weren’t for that, I don’t think I’d be working as an associate financial analyst for Eli Lilly and Company. What matters is that I got the theory and the practice from great professors who cared about my future.

Legacy of Hope capital campaigns to raise tens of millions of dollars, in part, to rebuild Catholic schools. These successful campaigns enabled the archdiocese to build the new Holy Angels School and extensively renovate Holy Cross Central School in Indianapolis, which resulted in national news coverage as the first new inner-city Catholic schools constructed in the United States since the 1960s.

Each year, the six center-city parish schools in Indianapolis that are now M other Theodore Catholic Academies help hundreds of students from low-income families rise above the cycle of poverty, achieve success in the classroom, and look to the future with hope and confidence.

Since 1985, 25 Catholic schools in the archdiocese have earned 31 national Blue Ribbon Awards from the U.S. Department of Education recognizing their excellence. A total of 22 Blue Ribbon Awards have been earned by archdiocesan schools in just the past five years—more than any other diocese in the country.
Religious sisters continue to leave their mark on students

By John Shaughnessy

In looking back on the 175-year history of the archdiocese, any list of the heroes of Catholic education would include parents, priests, religious brothers and lay teachers. Still, if you were searching for the “unsung heroes” of Catholic education in the archdiocese’s history, that distinction belongs to one special group of people: Religious sisters.

Indeed, ever since St. Theodora Guérin left France and arrived in the Indiana wilderness in 1840 with the goal of establishing an educational system for Catholic children, Religious sisters have been in place at Bishop Chatard since it opened in 1961. “They gave the example of their lives to teach us how to live. They were always willing to help other people, no matter what. And they taught us to do the same, beyond what they did for us with the three R’s. They formed my life,” says Bishop Chatard president William Sahm.

“Catholic education was very important to my parents,” says Sister Louise Hoeing, who teaches at St. Ambrose School in Seymour. “That Class of ’66 high school,” she says with a laugh. “That Class of ’66.”

“Catholic education was very important to my parents,” says Sister Louise Hoeing, who teaches at St. Ambrose School in Seymour. “That Class of ’66 high school,” she says with a laugh. “That Class of ’66.”

At 74, Benedictine Sister Louise Hoeing is in her 56th year as an educator in the archdiocese—first as a teaching and principal who has long served as the director of guidance at Bishop Chatard High School. Her life shows how Catholic education has changed in many ways through the years and yet still retains its roots.

“Catholic education was very important to my parents,” says Sister Louise Hoeing, who teaches at St. Ambrose School in Seymour. “That Class of ’66 high school,” she says with a laugh. “That Class of ’66.”

She remembers her childhood days at St. Joan of Arc School in Indianapolis when Providence Sister Catherine Siena played marbles with the boys and taught all her students to stand up for their beliefs. “I had 54 students in one class,” she recalls. “I took them to the fire station two blocks away one day. Did I have another adult with me? No. They obeyed. I taught them Latin, too. They thought they were the cat’s meow.”

During that time in the 1950s, she experienced a rare moment in Catholic education in the archdiocese. “In my first years of teaching, all the teachers were sisters,” she says. “Someone got sick and a woman by the name of Mrs. Nichter replaced her. She would have been one of the first lay teachers in the archdiocese.”

The changes came in her life, too. As a principal and teacher at St. Anthony School, she felt the pressure of Padua School in Clarksville in the early 1960s. Sister Louise qualified the opportunity to lead a school. She also thrived during the 10 years she served as principal of the former Our Lady of Grace Academy in Beech Grove.

“I had never been in a high school since I was in high school,” she says with a laugh. “That Class of ’66 helped me through. We still get together.”

Since 1975, she has been at Bishop Chatard, working mostly in the guidance department. She is the guidance counselor for half of each freshman class. A director of guidance, she also is a terrific source of knowledge for seniors who need help seeking college scholarships or finding a college that matches their gifts and their career plans, says Bishop Chatard president William Sahm.

“She has a great sense of humor, and she is compassionate and sensitive,” Sahm says. “She keeps track of all the deaths in the Bishop Chatard community—grandparents, aunts, uncles. She attends every wake and every funeral. And she has a mind for detail. She keeps track of her former students—how many kids they have, grandchildren, who they are married to, what’s going on in their lives.”

Sister Louise is part of a Benedictine tradition that has been in place at Bishop Chatard since it opened in 1961. Two other Benedictine sisters, Sister Susan Marie Lindstrom and Sister Kathleen Yeadon, also teach at the school.

“We’re so different,” Sister Louise says. “I see that as a plus. Students have the opportunity to see we’re not all in the same mold.”

Still, they are connected by a bond of faithfulness to helping Catholic students grow in their faith and their education. It’s a bond that has been weakened even as the number of religious sisters in Catholic schools has declined dramatically in Sister Louise’s lifetime.

“They have dedicated themselves to the needs of the Church, whatever it may be,” Sister Louise says about religious sisters through the generations. “In education, they have carried the torch of continuing the faith for children.”

She pauses and says, “I hope we’ve added something.” There’s no doubt, say admirers of religious sisters.

“Their dedication to their students has been remarkable,” Sahm says. “Just think of the amount of heart and soul they put toward their students. Equally important, they’re living symbols of commitment to Christ and their faith.” ♦

An answer to a parent’s prayer
Catholic education staff provides many support services

By Mary Ann Wyand

A archdiocesan Office of Catholic Education staff members are dedicated to providing a variety of educational support services for parish elementary schools and the archdiocesan interparochial high schools. Here is a look at some of their educational responsibilities.

School safety

Understandingly, parents are concerned about the safety of their children at Catholic schools and parish programs. G. Joseph Peters, associate executive director of Catholic education, has participated in the Indiana School Safety Specialist Academy since its inception by the Indiana Department of Education in 1999. "The Office of Catholic Education has held five training sessions for school teams on building state-of-the-art emergency operation plans for schools," Peters said. "We have scheduled three additional workshops for school safety training. The next workshop is June 10." He said the goal is for every Catholic school in the archdiocese to have a state-of-the-art emergency operation plan in place by Dec. 31, 2009. "All of our schools do have an emergency preparedness plan as required by law," Peters said, "but this training will enhance the uniformity and the quality ... based on an expert Tactical Site Survey in order to provide exemplary school safety preparedness and prevention."

Education and values

"We're the third largest school district in the state," Ron Costello, superintendent of Catholic schools, explained. "We have a very high percentage of students returning each year, and I believe that is true for all of our schools." A archdiocesan schools are accredited by the state, and Office of Catholic Education staff members ensure that those requirements are met by school staffs. "We help the schools with improvement efforts on those things that they identify as their priorities," Costello said. "In the school improvement plans required by the Office of Catholic Education and the state, most of our school staffs have identified improvements in writing and problem-solving skills as academic priorities. We work with our schools to improve their Catholic identity, and challenges with student enrollment, finances and development. The fact that we (nurture values) is a real testament to what is taking place in our schools," he said. "Service to the community is also an integral part of the mission of all our schools."

Teacher Mentor Program

The Office of Catholic Education is approved by the state to train experienced teachers to be mentor teachers for new educators, who must complete Indiana Department of Education requirements to convert their temporary, two-year license to permanent credentials. "We do our own mentor training because we're unique as Catholic schools," said Rob Rash, associate director of schools, administrative personnel and professional development. "We have more than 150 mentor teachers and over 250 first- and second-year teachers." Mentor teachers are required to have a master's degree and five years of experience, Rash explained. "Those mentor teachers work through their schools to train the new educators. "During the second year, the new teacher submits a portfolio, is videotaped and also has to show some student work," he said. "That is all submitted with the help of the mentor teacher to the state Department of Education to convert their temporary license." The mentor program increases retention of new teachers, he said, by creating a climate of dialogue between the new and experienced faculty members that enhances teamwork among the school staff.

Special education and legislative efforts

The number of students with disabilities who are enrolled in Catholic schools has grown in the last six years. Students with disabilities comprised 19 percent of the Catholic school enrollment in the archdiocese last year, explained Kathy Mears, associate director of schools and learning resources. "There are 13 legal categories of disabilities," Mears said, "and we serve children with disabilities in all 13 categories in our schools. We have worked to assist teachers and principals in learning new instructional strategies and ways that we can accommodate additional numbers of students with disabilities in our schools." Catholic school students include children who are blind, deaf or hard of hearing, and mildly or moderately mentally handicapped, she said, as well as students diagnosed with learning disabilities, communication disorders and autism.

Mears also serves the archdiocese by helping with legislative efforts for special education. She is a member of the state advisory council for special education. "On Dec. 2, we held the only training that is going to be offered by the state for non-public schools here at the Catholic Center," she said. "We had over 200 people attend the training session on the new Article 7, which is Indiana's special education law." The archdiocese and the Indiana Catholic Conference, the lobbying arm of the Church in the state are concerned about public funding for special education students in non-public schools. Mears said, "We want to make sure that our students are able to access the funds that they are generating through the state's special education law."

A Promise to Keep: God's Gift of Human Sexuality

Now in its 14th year, the archdiocesan Office of Catholic Education’s peer mentor chastity program continues to achieve excellent results with its faith-based, abstinence education curriculum for middle-school students taught by trained high school student volunteers.

Margaret Hendricks, coordinator of adolescent growth programs for the archdiocese, said research by Purdue University’s Department of Sociology found that the program has “substantially increased reported responsibility in decision-making regarding whether to be abstinent or not.”

She said a survey of 250 peer mentors in five Catholic high schools indicated that the curriculum also effectively reinforced the teenagers’ commitment to postponing sexual activity until marriage. During its 14-year History, she said, 7,000 teenage mentors have brought the A Promise to Keep abstinence education curriculum to 65,000 middle school students.

Hendricks, other Office of Catholic Education staff members and a committee of educators recently rewrote the archdiocesan guidelines for sexuality education, which reinforce Church teachings.

When you drive up the hill, you begin to realize that Cathedral’s 40-acre campus houses more than a college prep high school. This is where you’ll find your future.

You’ll be challenged academically, regardless of whether you earn straight As or work hard for your Cs. Whether you’re working through an International Baccalaureate group project or meeting a teacher for some extra help, you’ll be challenged to do your best. You’ll be supported with every effort.

You’ll have coaches and directors who will ask for 110 percent every time you take to the field, the court, or the stage. Just when you think you can’t possibly give more, you’ll be encouraged to reach your personal best.

And as it has been for nearly 90 years, you’ll be asked to live your faith and honor God through daily acts and deeds that may often go unnoticed, or through service projects (required for graduation) that exemplify Cathedral’s Catholic foundation and commitment to service for the greater community.

You’ll be a different person when you graduate than who you are today, and you’ll experience one amazing ride.

Parishes, families band together to support new high school

By Sean Gallagher

RICHMOND—As one of the newest schools in the archdiocese—with a history of only six years, the parents, 355 students and staff of Seton Catholic High School in Richmond have little opportunity to reflect upon their past.

Instead, they are focused on building their school as a family in the present so that it can have a bright future.

It is easy to see how the eastern Indiana Catholic high school is a family. Just walk into its cafeteria around lunch time, and you’ll see two parents of students serving food to the student body.

“The school needs volunteers to help it run,” said David Marsee while working on the lunch line. “But I enjoy it, too. I think it’s fun to get to know the kids that are in my kid’s classes.”

Some high school students might balk at seeing their parents in their school’s cafeteria. But not Seton freshman Daniel Marsee.

“They were there because of their support for our school.”

“I looked up in the stands and I saw not only my parents,” Daniel said. “People support the school because they want to see it grow. As it enlarges, it could offer so much more than we do currently. Daniel and his family are members of St. Andrew Parish in Richmond.

“Our parents and our students are cheering for our success,” said Seton principal Rick Ruhl. “And the students are so excited because so often those things that we do are brand new.”

One of the new things at the high school is a gymnasium that was opened last November.

Ruhl recalled how its 400 seats were filled and others stood to participate in the dedication ceremony. For him, it was an example of how all of the members of the three parishes that make up the Richmond Catholic Community—Holy Family, St. Andrew and St. Mary—are behind the school.

“I looked up in the stands and I saw not only our Seton parents, but grandparents and folks from the Richmond Catholic Community that didn’t even have any children connected with our school,” he said.

“They were there because of their support for our school.”

Father Todd Riebe, the pastor of three parishes that make up the Richmond Catholic Community, said that Catholic schools not only benefit from the broad support of their sponsoring faith communities, but also end up being a blessing to all.

“Catholic schools bring so many people together, uniting them in a common purpose and mission,” he said. “Parish, family and staff all work together to reinforce the Gospel values.”

A Catholic school benefits not only the students and families that are a part of the school. A Catholic school benefits the entire parish. This has certainly been our experience in Richmond.”

Historic school receives support from many generations

By Sean Gallagher

Catholic schools have been a part of the Archdiocese of Indianapolis since it was founded 175 years ago as the Diocese of Vincennes.

The members of St. Paul Parish in New Alsace know that for a fact. Their parish school was founded the same year—1834—and has never been closed. It is the oldest continually operating school in the archdiocese.

For many members of the southeastern Indiana parish, it is more than just a historical fact. Many of the families who call St. Paul their spiritual home have been living in the rolling hills around New Alsace for several generations.

Marcella McCann, 71, went to the school during the 1940s. Her mother studied there when she was a child. Each of McCann’s eight children was educated at St. Paul School and, thus far, 18 of her 22 grandchildren have been students there. Six grandchildren are currently enrolled.

But with only 64 students currently attending the pre-school through grade 6 school, it can be hard to keep it open.

McCann, though, is up to the challenge. She thinks her parish, as a whole is, too.
NEW ALSACE
"We all strive to keep the school alive. That's for sure," she said. "We participate in probably everything we can do to bring money in to help keep the school going. It means a lot to me."

It means so much that she does far more than simply help raise money for the school. She has also volunteered to clean its bathrooms on weekends, and to sew costumes for plays that the students perform.

Her husband has volunteered to work on the school’s plumbing system.

St. Paul School principal Michael Monning knows how important the volunteers are that come from throughout the parish, not just from parents who have children in the school.

"It's definitely a necessity in order to keep things functioning, and to keep up with the demands of the modern world in regard to technology and modern facilities," he said.

One of McCarr's daughters, Leah Schmidl, has inherited her mother’s dedication to the school. She taught there for six years during the mid-1990s, and has seen two of her children complete their elementary education there. Two more are currently students.

Schmidl sees the parish’s longstanding commitment to its school based in its faith.

"Religion is not just a tradition on the side where you go to church on Sundays," she said. "For us, it's life. We breathe our faith. We live our faith. We want to feed our children the faith."

Father Brian Esarey, pastor of St. Paul Parish, appreciates how the lady of the parish is so committed to the school.

"They are very hopeful and trust-filled, faithful people," he said. "The faith and the hope and the trust gives them that stimulus to continue to work and to give and to contribute to the school."

The hope of the St. Paul parishioners has allowed Monning to look to the future of the 175-year-old school that he leads.

"I hope to continue building our enrollment from the bottom up," Monning said. "We were recently approved to go ahead and add seventh and eighth grades. I think that is a big draw for the younger parents to know that their kids can attend here K [kindergarten] through eighth [grade]."

"The past is important, but we really need to give these kids a strong future. So you have to think about the future."

BROOKVILLE — Running a Catholic school on the stewardship model—where tuition is not charged and the school is supported solely by its sponsoring parish—isn’t just about the financial bottom line. It also serves as a means to form the character and faith of the school’s students, according to Kenneth Saxon, the principal of St. Michael School in Brookville, which is a stewardship school.

In the first semester of the 2008-09 academic year alone, parents of the students logged in nearly 6,000 hours of volunteer service at the school. “They’re setting an example for the kids,” Saxon said. “It’s not just to provide the service in itself. It’s also that example and to tell those kids, by action, that we believe in this school and what this school stands for and that we support it.”

Leah McCool is one of the parents who sets such an example. A member of St. Michael Parish and a mother of four children, three of whom are students at the parish school, McCool volunteers two and a half days a week as a teacher’s aide at the parish school.

“St. Michael School. That kind of support is priceless. You can’t put a price on that,” she said. “With the Franklin County schools, there wasn’t necessarily that closeness with the parents. There are probably a multitude of reasons for that. “But here, there’s a real closeness. They’re vitally involved in the education of their kids.”

For Father Randall Summers, St. Barnabas Parish’s administrator, it is certainly about prayer. But it is also about changing the hearts of more and more parishioners. “We’re continually trying to convert hearts to that,” he said. “It’s not a buzzword. It really is important for everybody to give according to what has been given to them.”

If we were able to convert all of the hearts of the parishioners here at St. Barnabas, I think we would have more gifts and talents and money than we would ever need.”

(To learn more about St. Barnabas Parish, including its school, log on to www.stbarnabasparish.org.)

And parents are expected to volunteer in the school. When Debra Perkins began her ministry as St. Barnabas School’s principal seven years ago, she was a bit skeptical that running a school on the stewardship model was really possible.

“The idea that it really does have to be everybody working together to pay the bills, to make it work, was something that I had to see to believe,” she said. “It’s sort of that we cross our fingers and say a prayer. But, seven years down the road, we have to say that it works.”

High school friends visit the brothers who shaped their lives

A trip to the past

By John Shaughnessy

The idea for the road trip seemed crazy at first. The kind of idea that good friends think of when the stories and the laughter flow. And yet the idea for the road trip seemed perfect. Too. A few of the friends knew they couldn’t wait any longer if they wanted to say “thank you” in person one more time. So the 15 friends from high school boarded a charter bus in Indianapolis in early December to begin the 21/2-hour trip to visit some of the religious brothers who had shaped their lives long ago.

As the bus headed north toward South Bend, Ind., the friends once again started sharing stories about the Holy Cross brothers who were their teachers and mentors at Cathedral High School in Indianapolis during the late 1950s and early 1960s.

“The impact the brothers had on our lives was huge,” says Fran Brezette, a 1960 Cathedral graduate. “Teaching young men was not just a job to the brothers, it was their vocation. They lived in community at the school, and we were part of their family. They were tough taskmasters, but their motivation was always to make us better people and better prepared for life after high school.”

The influence has lasted even though nearly 50 years have passed. Many of the Holy Cross brothers from that era at Cathedral have died, but some are retired and live at Holy Cross Village in South Bend, near the University of Notre Dame. Those religious brothers are often the topic of conversation when members of Cathedral’s Class of 1960 meet for lunch on the last Thursday of every month at the Golden Acre Inn in Indianapolis.

“The conversation is bound to turn to our high school days and what a unique experience Cathedral was in the late ’50s and early ’60s,” Brezette says.

“So many factors led to that uniqueness. The downtown location of the all-male school attracted students from all areas of the community, and covered the entire ethnic, social and economic spectrum. But we all generally agree that the primary reason for that uniqueness was a dedicated group of men from the Brothers of Holy Cross order.” Arriving at Holy Cross Village on Dec. 4, the group of friends from Indianapolis stepped off the bus and into their past.

They attended Mass and enjoyed lunch with many of their former teachers: Holy Cross Brothers Roland Driscoll, Joseph Berg, Raymond Harrington, Bernard Donahoe, John Dobrogowski, Carlilus Kirsch, James Kinsella and Ronald Christenson—all teachers at Cathedral in the late ’50s and early ’60s. Emotions were shared. Stories were told. Snapsshots were taken. “Thank you’s” were offered with hugs and handshakes. Smiles abounded as the years faded away, at least for one day.

“It was an emotional reunion for both groups,” Brezette says. “There were great stories, some no doubt embellished just a little, and fond memories of a simpler time when a dedicated group of brothers carried out their vocation of preparing young men for life. Based on the conversations we had in the bus on the return trip to Indianapolis, they did a very good job.

“It was incredible how good everyone felt about the trip.”

Students maintain improvement on ISTEP scores

In September 2008, 11,500 third- through 10th-grade students from 71 Catholic schools within the boundaries of the Archdiocese of Indianapolis took the Indiana Statewide Test of Educational Progress (ISTEP+). For the last eight years, students have shown and been able to maintain growth in their language arts/English and mathematics proficiency on the Indiana academic standards compared to the state of Indiana. The slight decline is due to no longer testing of the ninth-grade students, and phasing out of ISTEP at the 10th-grade level in favor of the end-of-course assessments. The average of archdiocesan students at each grade level passing both the language arts/English and mathematics is above both the non-public and Indiana state averages. The archdiocesan percentages range from 86 percent at third grade to 92 percent at eighth grade. The trend this year continues past student performance. Simply stated, the longer a student remains in archdiocesan schools the greater the growth in student proficiency.

Archdiocesan ISTEP+ Combined Results

All-school senior Mass

Catholic high school seniors fill St. Peter and Paul Cathedral on Dec. 10 as Archbishop Daniel M. Buechlein celebrates the annual Senior Mass. Seniors from private and interparochial Catholic high schools in the archdiocese gathered for worship with the archbishop and a number of diocesan priests. Some of the students assisted with the liturgy as altar servers, lectors, gift bearers and musicians.
